Statement of Significance

Last updated on - December 19, 1993

The Lady Northcote Children's Farm School was an idealistic philanthropic institution enabling poor and orphaned British children to come to Australia "to equip themselves for life". The early Modern buildings were designed in 1936-7 by Percy Meldrum of Meldrum and Noad.

The Northcote Farm School is of regional historic significance as an extraordinary embodiment of philanthropic social values, applied to an agricultural setting. It demonstrates adaptation to a changing pattern of occupancy as it evolved to a recreation camp.

It is also architecturally significant as early Modernist design and the work of Meldrum, an important eclectic architect of the period, not afraid to turn his hand to Modernism.

Intactness

The main building has been altered over time, sympathetically. The cottages do not have apparent alterations.

Physical Description 1

The Camp consists of an arc of timber cottages, arranged around the entire hillside, above the main building below. There is a tennis court, golf course, farm animals and barn, and a memorial granite plinth in front of the main building.

Each cottage is double-fronted and hip roofed; with the right being set forward and a verandah in the angle. Windows, including comers are double-hung and roof gutters are concealed behind fascias.
