Statement of Significance

Last updated on - October 1, 1982

Rosenfeld, of this group of three pilots houses, is the most mannered and, it is assumed, was Henry Reed's home. The group itself, as a private venture, is a counterpoint to the Pilots' Row which was built by the Colonial Government for the pilot service. These two groups perhaps represent best the beginnings of the Port Phillip pilot service itself, hence this group has statewide historic importance, and of the group, Rosenfeld is the most architecturally prominent.

Physical Description 1

Rosenfeld was first described as being of brick, having eight rooms and two pantries, as well as a slate roof.(S) It has a stucco front ruled as ashlar, two bayed windows with pilasters and a Tudor styled porch with a drip-mould over a central window. Simple geometric pattern fringing has been applied to the gable and window bay fascias. Terracotta chimney pots have been put on top of the original brick chimneys and the fence replaced.
