Interpretation of Site	Former house site with potential for in situ under floor deposits and outbuildings/additional features. Possibly dates from the turn of the century; demolished some time between 1977 and 1984. Artefacts include; Australian Glass Manufacturers (c. late 1930s), Northcote and Hoffman bricks (frogged), square riveted metal tank.
Archaeological Significance	The site maintains a medium level of integrity and intactness. Part of the chimney has been destroyed since 2005 (see earlier site card). Some timber joists and floorboards remain and there is high potential for archaeological deposits to remain around the house site. There is also the potential for subsurface evidence relating to outbuildings.
Historical Significance	The site is of local significance for its association with pastoral development of the area and for the development of the township at Diggers Rest, which was first established as a stopping point on the route to the gold fields and later serviced the local farming community.
