Physical Description 1

The c.1945 house at 139-41 Bryson's Road is built on bush stumps, using Yellow Box timber. It is a small house, externally clad in asbestos cement sheet, with a CGI roof, large chimneys, and timber-framed windows. The cladding was originally unpainted, but the facade and one side have recently been painted dark green. Some of the cladding on the rear appears to have been replaced fairly recently.

Nearby is a large shed, with a central gabled-roof, with two skillion sections each side. Externally clad in more recent corrugated iron, the interior reveals the heavy bush poles and sawn timber framing that were part of the original structure. Some original structural elements have been replaced by steel trusses. Part of the shed is lined with palings. The right-side skillion section has a smaller, newer steel roller shutter than the left-hand side. A further skillion-roof extension has been add to the left side.

The orchard landscape creates a continuity of setting, but does not retain any of the older orchard trees.
