Statement of Significance

Last updated on - January 1, 2000

The McKay housing subdivision is of historical and social significance as the first stage of the suburb created by Australia's leading industrialist and a milestone in the development of the industrial suburb, under the influence of the model worker's towns and Garden City movement. Sunshine became a yardstick for planning and housing reformers, with H.V. McKay being regarded as an expert on planned industrial housing. The McKay estate is of architectural significance as it marks a crucial phase in the development of Sunshine, housing the resident work force which promoted further industrial development.

The estate is also of historical significance in relation to H. V. McKay's important role in the history of industrial relations in Victoria and Australia, as the provision of housing for his workers was one of the arguments made by McKay in defending the Basic Wages Case which led to Justice Higgins' "Harvester Judgement". It is also historically significant for its associations with the dozens of employees of the Harvester Factory who built and resided in the houses.

The group of houses along Forrest Street, Ridley Street, Sydney Street, King Edward Avenue, and Kororoit Street, represent the type of houses built either by or for company employees, foremen and managers. The houses include major remnants of the large blocks allotted to senior staff of the Sunshine Harvester Works. Most of the houses were set back on their blocks with side drives, rather than rear service lanes, giving an air of spaciousness and permitting large gardens (of which some remnants survive).

Physical Description 1

The distinctive grid of streets with large blocks west of Anderson Road and north of Forrest Street and the adjoining radial street layout from the octagonal 'square' of Selwyn Park is part of a subdivision sponsored by the H.V. McKay Sunshine Harvester company early this century. Initially houses were erected in the eastern part of the estate, with roads and other services only gradually developed. Street tree plantings were a key part of the planning for the 'Garden Suburb'. The subdivision was laid out with large gardens, with both deep and wide blocks as part of this garden suburb philosophy. While a number of the houses have survived, the large blocks and their proximity to central Sunshine and the railway station, attracted flat development in the 1960s and 70s. As a consequence, houses on the east end of Forrest Street and in Anderson Road between Forrest Street and King Edward Avenue, have almost universally been replaced by two storey elevated walk up brick flats. On the eastern side of Anderson Road are the H.V. McKay Gardens, bowling club, Presbyterian Church and Chaplain Reserve.

The surviving houses that are contributory to the precinct include the following:

A number of places were identified in the original survey as of potential significance but were not deemed to be contributory to the significance of the precinct. These include several houses built in the mid-twentieth century often having associations with the Sunshine Harvester Works, but representing a different phase in the history of the area. There were also a number of other places demolished during or following the original 2000 Heritage Study. The places include the following:

Physical Conditions

While a number of the houses have survived, the large blocks and proximity to central Sunshine and the railway station have attracted flat development in the 1960s and 70s. As a consequence houses on the east end of Forrest Street and in Anderson Street between Forrest Street and King Edward Avenue, have almost universally been replaced by two storey elevated walk up brick flats. West of Adelaide Street, however, the original building pattern was more scattered with many gaps left between the McKay period houses, some not built on until after the hiatus caused by the 1930s depression or even after World War Two.
