Statement of Significance

Last updated on - May 11, 1999

Siebel's Farmhouse was erected in 1860 by Johann Gottlob Siebel and replaced an earlier one in which he had lived since first settling in Thomastown in 1850. The cottage is constructed of bluestone with asymmetric gable ends. Although it has been extensively altered it retains many of its early features including its original bread oven and cellar and one timber outbuilding. The letters J G S are inscribed in the keystone over the front door. Born at Zauchau, Silesia in 1813, Johann Siebel had arrived in Australia aboard the Emmy in 1849 with his wife Christiane and at least two children as part of a scheme for sponsored German immigration initiated by William Westgarth.

Siebel's Farmhouse is of historic and architectural importance to the State of Victoria.

Siebel's Farmhouse is of historical significance for its association with the State's promotion of German settlement. As one of five remaining farmhouses of the original settlement, it is a significant reminder of the way of life of the early German settlers in Victoria. Siebel's farmhouse is important architecturally as being the only remaining farmhouse of the original German settlement to have its original bread oven and cellar. This contributes to an understanding of the way of life of the early German settlers in Victoria.

As part of the Westgarthtown settlement, Siebel's farmhouse has an important association with William Westgarth, merchant, financier, politician, historian and notable pioneer who was directly responsible for immigrant communities in Victoria.

Siebel's farmhouse is important for its association with Joseph Gottlob Siebel, who was active in the development of the Lutheran Church in both Westgarthtown and Melbourne, serving as both a foundation trustee of the nearby church and school and as a foundation member of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Victoria's Synod.

History

Contextual History:History of Place:

The first phase of German migration to Victoria began in the 1840s, following successful settlement of German communities from the late 1830s in South Australia. Impressed by the South Australian example, William Westgarth, a Melbourne importer, undertook a migration program to assist German families settle in Victoria. He sought to encourage the settlement by using the Government-sponsored migration scheme as an incentive. Although only a few Germans who came did actually qualify under this scheme, Westgarth was instrumental in encouraging German settlement in Port Phillip prior to the 1850s goldrushes.

The first settlement of 10 families was established at Germantown near Geelong (now called Grovedale), from immigrants arriving on the "Emmy" and selected for settlement by Dr Thomson and William Westgarth. The Westgarthtown settlement began on 22 June, 1850 with the purchase of 640 acres at £1 per acre by Westgarth and Captain John Stanley Carr, guardian to the young Prince Friederich of Augustenburg. The land was purchased direct from the Government, with the plan to survey and divide it for settlement "by lot, or by mutual agreement" for the newly arriving immigrants.

Germany like most of Europe in the early nineteenth century suffered severe economic conditions. There was no shortage of immigrants escaping from overcrowding, unemployment and food shortages, the latter particularly in the 1840s. For Germans upheavals in the Protestant churches and military service requirements were an added incentive to seek greener pastures. During the seventy years between 1815 and 1885, 5 million people being approximately 10 per cent of the population emigrated, principally to the United States.

The first arrivals at Westgarthtown were, for the most part, from Saxony, Prussia and rural Silesia. The majority were tradespeople rather than farmers. Even so, the first group of families chose lots by ballot after being naturalised, and set about clearing the stony land for cultivation and erecting temporary shelter.

Land (10 acres) was reserved for a church, cemetery school and shop in the centre of the block, adjoining the creek. These resources were paid for by the settlers. The remaining land was subdivided into 16 blocks running east-west on either side of the creek, allowing access to the water by all the landholders. (See Figure 1). The creek (originally called Dry Creek and now known as Edgar's Creek) proved unreliable in summer months, so the settlers were given legal access to a spring in the north of the Section (just north of present day Robert Street).

The ownership arrangements for the subdivision were a complicated arrangement. The land had been purchased in trust by Westgarth and Carr. The title documents for each allotment required the signatures of all parties (each settler, Westgarth and Carr had to sign the landsale/ purchase documents for each other settler, being all part owners of the total section). Most of the mortgages were handles by Wilhelme Brahe, whose brother was to be a member of the ill-fated Burke and Wills expedition in 1862.

By 1857, William Westgarth noted with satisfaction that there had been "considerable progress in the form of a scattered village, with a little Lutheran Church and some show of gardening and cultivation." He observed that the German settlers still used their own language, and appeared to be prosperous. Many had benefited from the demand for fresh produce on the goldfields from 1851, supplying milk, butter, cheese, fruit, vegetables and eggs, and driving bullock teams from the ports to the goldfields. Most families had established dairy farms, and supplied milk to Melbourne. By 1862, the Thomastown Dairy was operating at 114 Little Lonsdale Street East. Dairying predominated in the area until the mid 1950s, and ceased altogether in 1972 with the sale and subdivision of the last remaining farmland owned by the Ziebell family (north of the cemetery and farmhouse and now completely built over).

In 1934 Albert Siebel acquired the Murray Road, Preston dairy and named it Pura Dairy. By 1964 it provided 32% of Melbourne's milk, as well as supplying rural Victoria and Tasmania.

The population of Westgarthtown remained stable until the post World War II population boom. A housing development for ex-servicemen was planned on 245 acres, including land purchased from the Seeber and Maltzahn families. It was to be, ironically, another "planned" community. With the influx of European migrants, almost all of the original Westgarth purchase was "sold, subdivided and suburbanised", leaving only the church and cemetery reserve intact.

William Westgarth 1815-1889

William Westgarth arrived in Victoria on 13 December, 1840 and over the next 17 years, established himself as a merchant, financier, politician, statistician and acute observer of social life in Victoria. At the time of his involvement with the promotion of German settlers, Westgarth was involved in a variety of causes. Most notably, he was instrumental in founding the Melbourne Chamber of Commerce, the first gas company in Victoria, and the Bank of Victoria.

Westgarth established an import partnership in 1845, and he maintained his interests in the firm (Westgarth, Ross and Spencers) even after returning to England in 1857. The Australian Dictionary of Biography records Westgarth's commitment to democratic ideals such as his campaigning for the end of transportation to the colonies, support for the Melbourne Mechanics' Institute, the abolition of property qualifications, and free selection of land (the 'unlocking of the lands'). In 1854 he was appointed by Lieutenant Governor Hotham to chair the Commission of Inquiry into conditions on the Victorian Goldfields, following the Eureka uprising. One of the consequences of his chairmanship was the encouragement of limited liability mining companies in an attempt to reduce the monopoly of large mining companies on the goldfields.

In 1850 Westgarth became a Member of the NSW Legislative Council and after separation of Victoria in 1851, one of three Members of the Legislative Council of Victoria for Melbourne. Westgarth's initiative in assisting German immigrants to settle in Victoria stemmed partly from his active support for the establishment of enterprising new ventures in the developing colony, based on the importing of skills and traditions of working people. He recorded his regard for the "industry, frugality, sobriety, and general good conduct" of the Germans who had already settled in South Australia in the 1840s, and observed that Victoria already could benefit from such a community, particularly with vineyards and gardens.

History of Place:

From the Whittlesea Conservation Study:

Siebel's farmhouse was erected in 1860 by Johann Gottlob Siebel and replaced an earlier one in which he had lived since first settling in Thomastown in 1850.

Johann Siebel arrived in Australia aboard the Emmy in 1849 with his wife Christiane and at least two children. Born at Zauchau, Silesia in 1813, he had served for several years in the German army as a Grenadier.

Siebel established a dairy farm at Westgarthtown on thirty acres purchased in 1851. Later the farm was enlarged to ninety acres by the purchase of two adjoining properties. Siebel was also active in the development of the Lutheran Church in both Westgarthtown and Melbourne, serving as both a foundation trustee of the nearby church and school and as a foundation member of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Victoria's Synod. He died in 1877 aged 64.

Descendants of Johann Gottlob Siebel continued dairying at "Westbourne Park", as the farm became known, until the 1940s. In 1934 a grandson, Albert Siebel, established the Pura Dairy in Murray Road, Preston. From a one cart dairy delivering only to a few adjacent streets, the Pura brand grew to become the best known in Victoria.
