Why is it significant?

The Continental Hotel is of historical significance to the State of Victoria for its associations with George Coppin businessman, politician and entrepreneur whose enterprise was largely responsible for the development of Sorrento from the 1870s to the 1890s as a seaside resort. Coppin established a number of business ventures associated with the Continental Hotel such as the steamer service from Melbourne and the Sorrento tramway to encourage tourism to Sorrento.

The Continental Hotel is of architectural significance to the State of Victoria as a relatively intact example of the type of hotel development popular in the later years of the nineteenth century providing accommodation, entertainment and associated hotel services for wealthy city tourists. The Continental Hotel, constructed of local limestone, is important as a landmark building for the seaside town of Sorrento as it is situated on a prominent site at the entry to the town.

History

Contextual History:

George Coppin

George Coppin was born at Steyning in Sussex, England on 8 April 1819 into a theatrical family. His father was disowned by his family for abandoning his medical studies to join a band of strolling players. As a young child, George was part of the world of the travelling theatre, and by the age of 16 had chosen acting as his career. In 1842, with actress Maria Watkins Burroughs, he left England for Australia, arriving in Sydney on 10 March 1843. Coppin negotiated a season at the Royal Victoria Theatre and with his profits, bought a hotel. This venture failed and he left Sydney for Hobart in January 1845. He soon formed his own company, playing in Launceston and then Melbourne and Adelaide. Coppin prospered in Adelaide, with interests in a hotel, racing and copper mining. In 1848, Maria, with whom he had lived since 1842, died after a brief illness.

In 1851, the exodus from Adelaide to the Victorian goldfields and the collapse of Coppin's mining investments caused his insolvency. He left for the goldfields himself and soon realised the opportunities for the theatre in Geelong, where successful miners formed appreciative audiences. He was able to pay his Adelaide creditors in full by 1853.

In the same year he left for a visit to England where he engaged tragedian G. V. Brooke for an Australian tour. Returning to Melbourne in December 1854, Coppin held a successful season in the Queen's Theatre. Brooke arrived in February 1855 to play Othello. In July 1855, Coppin opened a prefabricated building he had purchased in Manchester as the Olympic Theatre, locally known as the Iron Pot. Brooke and Coppin went into partnership later that year, and soon controlled the Olympic, the Theatre Royal, the Cremorne Gardens Amusement Park, Astley's Amphitheatre (later the Princess Theatre) and four hotels. Coppin married Brooke's sister-in-law, Harriet Hilsden, nee Bray in August 1855.

Coppin was instrumental in the foundation of the Victorian Humane Society, the St. John's Ambulance Service, and the Australasian Dramatic and Musical Association: and he became the first grand master of the Freemasons in Victoria. He established free dispensaries in Richmond and in 1885, with the Rev. Charles Strong, formed the Improved Dwellings and Lodging House Company to erect a tenement for working class families between Lonsdale and Little Bourke Streets. It was later converted to a lodging house for single men known as Gordon House.

Coppin's career as a politician, first in the Richmond Municipal Council, and later in the Victorian Parliament brought him into contact with many influential men in business and political circles.

Sorrento

Sorrento was the site for Victoria's first settlement in 1803, when David Collins on HMS Calcutta landed at Sullivan's Bay. He attempted to found a penal colony with three hundred convicts but by 1804 the party was removed to Van Diemen's Land.

The exact date of permanent settlement at Sorrento is not known but limeburning was being carried on in 1840 and a number of limeburning kilns were established along the shore by 1855.

In 1870, Coppin brought a group of businessmen to Sorrento by steamer to interest them in the development of the town as a tourist destination. He became involved in a number of public and commercial ventures to develop the town. He instigated the Ocean Amphitheatre Company (1874), the Sorrento & Queenscliffe Navigation Company (1874), the Sorrento Continental Hotel Company (1875), the Sorrento Tramway Trust (1875), the Ocean Park Trust (1875), the Mechanics Institute Trust (1876) and the Sorrento Park Trust (1874). His companies purchased most of the township area of 225 acres, subdividing it into household blocks for re-sale, and built six demonstration houses.

The Sorrento & Queenscliffe Navigation Company was very successful in improving access to Sorrento. By 1876, three steamers were running to the town and were landing more than 1000 people a day. Later steamers, such as the Ozone, introduced in 1880, could carry eight hundred passengers, and the Hygeia, introduced in 1890, fifteen hundred.

History of Place:

The Continental Hotel

The Continental Hotel is historically important for its associations with George Coppin whose enterprises are accepted as implementing Sorrento's growth as a bustling seaside resort town for wealthy city tourists in the later years of the nineteenth century. The Continental Hotel was built by the Sorrento Continental Hotel Company under the directorship of entrepreneur George Coppin in 1875. Thomas Anderson is believed to be the builder. The designer of the building is unknown.

The Continental Hotel was developed as a response to the overwhelming demand for accommodation for the city tourists seeking a holiday at the growing seaside resort of Sorrento. Upon its construction, the Continental Hotel was advertised as the model of a modern tourist destination providing accommodation, entertainment and associated hotel services. Coppin established a number of associated business ventures to cater for the needs of visitors. Guests were provided with transport directly from the steamer to the hotel, with a guarantee of dinner in the elegant dining saloon upon their arrival. The verandahs and the tower offered guests a magnificent view of the Peninsula. The Continental Hotel has been operated by numerous owners and managers who have developed the building as needed to accommodate the changing requirements of guests. A separate ballroom was established on Constitution Hill Road in 1903, which was joined to the hotel by a footbridge.

The Continental Hotel is important as a landmark building for the seaside town of Sorrento. Constructed using locally quarried rock faced limestone, the Continental is a four storey building which includes the mansard roofed, prominent square tower, return balcony on the upper levels and two storey section to the rear of the building. The distinctive mansard roofed tower resembles those of some other boom period hotels, particularly the Ozone Hotel at Queenscliff (c1881). The building has undergone some major changes to accommodate the changing requirements of the tourist trade over time. The Moderne style renovation to the ground and first floors, including a roof top balcony incorporate an earlier addition to the street boundary. The building incorporates the original general store (c1882/1883).
