Statement of Significance

Last updated on - May 13, 2004

A single-manual organ of eighth stops, believed to be an early work of the Melbourne organbuilder William Anderson, which has been subject to many moves. Its earliest known location was the Presbyterian Church, Williamstown from where it was removed about 1882 to "Dhurringile", Murchison, the property of James Winter. The organ was moved to its present location in 1939 from the Baptist Church, Kew. It is a substantial example of a single manual organ, with an eight-foot facade. Subsequent changes have included the substitution of an Angelica for the original Twelfth, the addition of tuning slides, and the obliteration of the original stencilling of the facade pipes with gold paint.
