Historical Significance	The site represents the activities of early pastoral and agricultural peoples in Victoria. It reflects aspects of subsistence practices and domestic and commercial activities during a period of sustained economic hardship for a minority ethnic group (the Italians - if it can be proved the Italians worked the site). For this reason, as an early example of Italian activity, the site holds medium historical significance.
Interpretation of Site	This rich alluvial flood plain has probably supported a variety of crops since the mid 1800s. It is likely that Pinkerton ploughed and sowed crops here. However, the only visible remains relate to the 1920s and later and appear to be associated with medium to large scale market gardening and irrigation infrastructure.
Archaeological Significance	The site is of medium significance as a 1920s market garden and subsistence farming venture conducted by European people (in this case Italians). The site also holds some significance as it represents a fairly large scale venture that was initiated and operated during the 1920-1930 depression. In addition, the area holds potential to reveal information concerning Pinkerton's earlier occupation of land, c. 1850 - 1860s.

History

The first European to own this parcel of land was George Sherwin. In 1848 or 1849 James Pinkerton purchased the land and used it predominantly for sheep farming. Pinkerton sold to William Clark (Big Clark), who was also a sheep farmer, in c.1862. Local oral history suggests that during the 1830s Italian market gardeners used the site. The area is also part of the home paddock from the Pinkerton owned property. It is now on land owned by Western Water.
