History

The site, situated 20 miles north of Melbourne, was part of the Bank Vale run which William John Turner Clarke, later known as 'Big' Clarke, had taken over in the early 1840s. From 1845 the site appears to have then been part of John Riggs' 'Rocky Water Holes Run' before in February 1852 Sections 24, 25 and 26 in the Parish of Mickleham (of 616, 401 and 349 acres respectively) was purchased from the Crown by Richard Brodie, the largest and longest standing squatter in this area. Brodie sold the property to John Williams, a farmer, in 1852. On the land purchased by the Williams family was a dense redgum forest called the 'Groville Forest' which is now completely cleared off the property, although a remnant of this original band of redgum forest can still be seen immediately south of the property, across Donnybrook Road.

Williams died in 1860, leaving the three Crown Sections to each of his three sons:- Section 26 to William, Section 25 to Francis, and Section 24 to John.

Upon marrying, William settled on the northern part (Section 26) of Groville Forest property which he successfully farmed until his death in 1911. In 1883 he was in possession of an 11 roomed house which was probably that shown on an early twentieth century map (as Credinia or Crodinia) in the middle of the property, accessed by a long right-of-way off Donnybrook Road. The house was unoccupied by 1938.

After the Second World War the property was sold to Mr F.R. Walker, of Euroa who assembled a large landholding in the area which incorporated all three of William's original sections into the present Kalkallo Park.
