History

In 1890, the Defence department purchased (from Travers Adamson) the two story waterfront building known as Maytone. From 1910 – 1947, it was used predominantly as an officer mess, except for a short period where it became the Commanding Officers Quarters for three years from 1916 (Tate, 1982: 75, 109). In 1946, Maytone was used converted to a married quarters for officers of the Australian Staff College (Tate, 1982: 104).

The attack on Pearl Harbour in 1941 saw the realisation of the potential of air power for long distance attacks. Anti-aircraft guns were installed in the local football field, along with a 4 inch gun near Crows Nest Camp to combat this threat.

With the threat of war so close to home during WWII, proposals were made towards the end of the war for dual purpose lightweight guns for anti aircraft and small vessel deterrence, which were installed at the football ground and near Crows Nest. The operations at the Heads were scaled down by the end of the war, and Pt Nepean defences were declared redundant. In 1946 the guns were removed from Fort Queenscliff and it was converted to the Australian Staff College (Noble, 1979: 109; Perry, 1973:49; Hunt, 1999:24).

In 1942, two 4.7 quick firing guns were mounted at Crows Nest Battery. Both sets of guns had rear protection shields. In that same year, a sentry at Crows Nest was killed by an unknown person, who later fired on other soldiers. The threat of war appeared closer to home around this time, when enemy submarine and aircraft were sighted in the area (Tate, 1982: 97- 99,114,121).

There was a big gun emplacement behind Maytone (Guesthouse) during WWII (Werry, pers comms)

A cannon was still present in Crows Nest in the 1950s or 60s. The army moved it into the fort later on (Don Love).
