Interpretation of Site	The earliest components of the site appear to be the house itself. The concrete slab surrounding the house is probably a later addition, as would be the septic tank system and the steel windmill arrangement. The house structure could date to the mid 19th century with the other main components representing continued occupation of the site.
Archaeological Significance	Quite a lot of this site's features are in good condition and an archaeological excavation would reveal much more about the site's occupants and period of use. However, with so little background information known about the site, its archaeological significance is only rated at medium.
Historical Significance	This site holds medium significance as an example of early settlement within the region and insight into what may have 'made' or 'broken' individual community families. As a well constructed residence that shows some continuation through time, this site would make interesting research in regard to the markup of the local community.
