Interpretation of Site	The site is likely to be the foundations of farm outbuildings and possibly dates from the late 19th century as indicated by the materials used.
Archaeological Significance	The site has medium archaeological significance and maintains a moderate level of intactness and integrity. Little ground disturbance has impacted the site. No artefacts were observed on the surfact. This may be due to the build up of soil levels across the site. There is the potential for subsurface deposits to remain.
Historical Significance	The site is of local historical significance for its relationship to farming practices in the area from the late 19th century and provides a link to and evidence associated with the development of the Diggers Rest area and local industry.
