Physical Description 1

This building was opened in 1889; the architect was C.D. Figgis and the builder W. Robertson. It has an elaborate front facade with an interesting arcade at ground level with unusual cement render detailing, particularly the front domical entrance reveal. At first floor the three bays employ a Palladian 3 window motif. The facade is capped with a bracketted cornice with central pediment and a balustraded parapet on either side carrying garlanded urns. Internally the large central hall of the former Exchange comprises arcaded brick booths along both sides and surmounted by similarly arched clerestory windows at first floor level. The most interesting and unusual features of the building are the light tension rod roof trusses and the bull nose profile roof which returns across the rear in a hipped form.

This building is basically intact other than the street verandah and shop fronts. It is in generally sound condition in spite of the lack of maintenance.

This building is important historically and architecturally. It has direct links with the gold mining era when Ballarat was a city of world prominence and is one of the few physical manifestations remaining of this activity. The only other Exchange remaining is in Charters Towers in Queensland. It is also of major significance architecturally. The roof structure in particular, and the central hall have no other precedents in this state.
