Statement of Significance

Last updated on - March 6, 2023

What is significant?

Historical artefacts were discovered during CHMP testing. Artefacts included saddlery artefacts, a musket ball, nineteenth-century glass and ceramic and an R. Parker Ironmonger token. The area first recorded European occupation was in 1856, the Carters established Brim Springs (also known as Geranium Spring) in the area. There are not many historical references available online for the area, but the site is marked by interpretive signage.

How is it significant?

The site is of regional historical and archaeological significance.

Why is it significant?

Brim Springs is historically significant for its connection to the early phase of European occupation within the Grampians region. It has the potential to provide archaeological features, deposits and artefacts relating to domestic and pastoral occupation of this region and contain information about the lives of people in this area in the nineteenth century.

Interpretation of Site	The place is currently utilised as a picnic area within the Grampians National Park. From limited excavation and analysis, it appears that the site is a blacksmithing or stable site. The ironmongering token places a minimum age on the site of c.1857. The site has potential to contain further archaeological deposits that would inform early European activities within the Grampians National Park
