Statement of Significance

Last updated on -

The house at 85 McPherson Street, Essendon, was built in 1890 for Thomas William Armistead. It is aesthetically important (Criterion E) as one of the larger villas of the locality having an unusual plan form expressed with exceptional timber ornamentation to the windows and roof and demonstrating that timber construction was the equal of masonry for its capacity to express the flamboyance of the Land Boom period.

Physical Description 1

An unusual symmetrical timber villa with cast iron verandah to the facade returning around both sides and terminating at jerkin head roofed projecting wings, the bracketed eaves being extended across the face of the wings in the form of a cornice. The weatherboards are rusticated whilst the front windows have extended bracketed sills with fielded panels beneath. The roof retains its patterned slate cladding. The condition is sound and integrity is high.
