Physical Description 1

Set out in the traditional manner, the hotel has long frontages to two streets, a slated and hipped roof and the archetypical splayed corner entrance. It is two storeys and, atop the basalt base course, has cemented walls, sparsely adorned with the then fashionable Italian Renaissance revival detail. Adjoining on the north is an Edwardian parapeted and gabled face-brick former factory (?), now serving as an extension to the hotel.

Integrity

External Integrity

One upper level and ground level openings and detailing, have been altered, also diverse plumbing and signs have been added. The stone plinth has been painted but the cemented facade is a sympathetic colour for the period. The brick structure adjoining has also been painted. A unsympathetic addition has been made to the east (bottle shop and lounge).

Physical Description 2

Streetscape

A traditional corner building and the start of a period streetscape going north along Whitehall Street.

Physical Description 3

The incorporation of two buildings to form the hotel raises the potential for archaeological analysis to be used to establish the sequence of construction on the site.
