Physical Description 1

Northbrook House is a single storey Victorian Italianate villa of 1889, unusually planned about a square top-lit hall at the centre and an axial through corridor. Internally there are particularly fine stencilled and gilded ceilings and a dining room especially complete in its timberwork, including a panelled ceiling, cornice like picture rail and supporting pilasters, window cases, chimney piece, dado and sideboards built in against the wall with continuous skirting.

Externally, the building is asymmetrical and has an arched and rusticated entrance porch with a balustraded balcony above. There are paired brackets to eaves (with festoons between pairs; these brackets and the asymmetry particularly reflect the Italianate styling), pediment-style decorations to tall chimneys, and vermiculated quoins. The slate roof is hipped in form. It would appear that the verandas which originally encircled the main rooms were removed by the council in the early days of its ownership. Finishes and materials originally used throughout the building were of the highest order. Several vaulted ceilings have recently been uncovered and two of these are magnificently adorned with what appear to be finished wall papers. Several cherubic figures are portrayed on the ceiling in the foyer outside the dining room. Other rooms are large and well proportioned with tiled fireplaces and handsomely fitted mantelpieces. A large central foyer or atrium is panelled in imported timber. The entrance foyer has marble paving and crystal door knobs are fitted to the front entrance door.
