Statement of Significance

Last updated on - May 11, 2004

Treverbyn (the former Tyrone), has high local significance as a brick farm house of the 1880s built at Harkaway for Robert Kelly, son of the pioneer farmer James Kelly. The site also contains an older building of wattle and daub construction which may relate to the earlier ownership of James Kelly from c1853.

Aesthetically, it is significant as house in a fine rural setting, which contributes to the cultural landscape character of the Harkaway district and is notable for its mature trees and well-kept English Hawthorn hedge along the King Road frontage.

Physical Description 1

The oldest section of the house is a simple late Victorian symmetrical villa constructed in exposed brown brick with a slate roof. The front fenestration has been altered from the original with twin sashed windows. The convex verandah also appears to be relatively recent and unadorned. Additions to the house extend to the north-west, creating a U-shaped plan. Other buildings on the site include corrugated iron sheds, a small building with a terracotta tiled roof and a very old building possibly constructed in wattle and daub with wooden shingles beneath corrugated iron.

The house is set in a garden with many fine mature trees. Related landscape elements include the English Hawthorn hedge along the King Road frontage.
