Physical Description 1

This house' was designed on two levels, the first floor containing a kitchen-dining area, a separate living room with a balcony overlooking the native forest below, and the upper part of a studio which was at ground level beside the car-port below. As a reversal of traditional practice, the ground floor held all of the bedrooms, bathroom. and a laundry. Typically for a Modernist house, .the living areas faced north through ample full-width glazing, with an eaves overhang for shading in summer. Natural timber, fitted by the owner Lowen, was used as internal facings (including vertical 'knotty pine' and hardwood vertical boarding was used on the outside along with timber framed window walls with (originally deep-blue) painted spandrels. The main roof of corrugated cement sheet is in two differently sloping skillion forms, one almost reaching the ground at the rear of the house, over the carport, prompting the observation in 1956 that it was 'tent like', This house is one of a group in this part of North Warrandyte.
