Statement of Significance

Last updated on - October 26, 2004

Serindip, 456 Upper Heidelberg Road, Heidelberg, is a single storey house believed to have been erected for Englishman John Bear circa 1859. The stuccoed brick house is constructed on bluestone foundations and has a slate roof. There is an encircling timber verandah with shaped (later?) brackets. Sets of triple windows are located about the central doorway, all of which have architrave-type surrounds.

Serendip, 456 Upper Heidelberg Road, Heidelberg, is a substantial early house important in the history of the early settlement of the district and within the historic townscape of Heidelberg. The building is largely Colonial in style but with some Classical Revival details, notably the window surrounds. The triple window motif is most unusual and gives the house a distinctive appearance. The present form of the verandah columns is probably not original.

Serendip, 456 Upper Heidelberg Road, Heidelberg, is in good condition and is reasonably intact.

Of local significance.
