Group Statement of Significance: Melbourne's cast iron public urinals have national historic, technological, aesthetic and social significance. They are the survivors of a group of about 40 structures erected between c.1903 and 1918 and connected to the new underground sewerage system. Cast by C. Monteath & Sons, Ironfounders of South Melbourne, they employed a prefabricated interlocking post and panel system which enabled the urinals to be assembled on site, or dismantled and relocated. While all still function as toilets, the fabric of some is more intact than others and a number have been converted from male urinals to unisex and disabled facilities.

Being among the earliest public toilet facilities to be connected to the MMBW's new underground sewerage system, the above ground cast iron urinals are unique material reminders of Melbourne's evolution into a healthier, cleaner and more attractive metropolis in the first two decades of the twentieth century. As rare surviving examples of a highly sophisticated prefabricated iron building system applied to one of man's most basic needs, they demonstrate local technological accomplishment. Functional in their design, and compact in their use of city space, the cast iron urinals display elegant ornamentation, particularly in the delicate upper grillework. The public urinals have important symbolic significance as historical vestiges of social inequality in the provision of public toilet facilities for men and women earlier this century.
