Statement of Significance

Last updated on -

The present Fincham Organ factory building is the sole remaining section of a factory complex established on this site by George Fincham in 1862. From this site, Fincham built organs for churches, public halls and residences throughout Australia and New Zealand. He was the major Australian organbuilder last century and built such major instruments as those in the Exhibition Building, the Australian Church, Freemasons Hall and St. Kilda Town Hall. The number of instruments he built or rebuilt is thought to exceed 200.

All of the sections which comprise the present factory (voicing room, machine room, pipe shop and erection area) are of historical significance, with the exception of modern office extension to the north,
