Statement of Significance

Last updated on - November 4, 1999

What is significant?

The former Mercantile Bank at 345-349 Collins Street, was constructed in 1888 to a design by William Salway in conjunction with Gerard Wight and William Lucas. It was built of brick and concrete with a rendered facade incorporating polished granite at the base. Its five storeys and basement were originally crowned with a dome and flanking French-style high-pitched roofs. These were replaced by a simple pitched roof during substantial 1923 alterations.

How is it significant?

The former Mercantile Bank is of historical and architectural significance to the State of Victoria.

Why is it significant?

The former Mercantile Bank is of historical significance as a reminder of the 1880s land boom and subsequent collapse, a period of immense political and economic significance in Victoria's history. The building is the last remaining land bank in Collins Street from the 1880s boom. It was originally built as the head office of the Mercantile Bank, a typical boom-era institution run by influential men with questionable business ethics, and fuelled by profits from land speculation. The trials and political controversy following the collapse of the Bank in 1892, under the chairmanship of Sir Matthew Davies, speaker of the Victorian Legislative Assembly, made for some of the most dramatic events and scandalous news in the post-land boom period.

The former Mercantile Bank is of architectural significance because it typifies the architectural extravagance of the land boom period. The building's boom-style classicism is a combination of mannerist and baroque influences all assembled with a typical Victorian eclecticism and boom-era extravagance. The largely intact facade is a reminder of the flamboyance, not to mention recklessness, of a period that had profound effects on the built fabric and political culture of Melbourne.

History

Contextual History:History of Place:

The Bank of Melbourne building was originally built as the head office of the Mercantile Bank. The Mercantile Bank was established in 1877 under the name The Australian Economic Bank Limited. In 1885 the name was changed to the Mercantile Bank after a take over by Sir Matthew Davies and his associates, and the nominal capital increased from 500,000 pounds to 1,000,000 pounds. The bank engaged in the typical activities of the speculative land banks of the 1880s until dozens of land companies both inside and outside the Davies group ran into trouble, dragging the Mercantile down with them. Scandalous mismanagement of the bank's affairs soon came to light and the directors, including Davies, and managers were charged with issuing a false and fraudulent balance sheet. Davies' friends in the political establishment, including Thomas Bent, tried to thwart a trial, and political scandal soon engulfed the financial scandal. Claim and counter-claim animated court proceedings over two years, government members clashed and the Solicitor-General resigned; magistrates complained of intimidation; Sir Matthew Davies and his wife fled to Colombo where they were arrested and returned to Melbourne to face the court. Eventually, in February 1894, three of the original figures associated with the bank, including Davies, were acquitted of issuing a false balance sheet. Cannon, in his book "The Land Boomers" concluded: "the members of the jury retired for an hour and a quarter, and returned to announce that they found all the defendants not guilty. Did they decide on the evidence? Did they feel sympathy at last towards Sir Matthew Davies in his long agony? We shall never know. One thing was certain. In those wonderful days of untrammelled banking, it was no crime to borrow 100,000 pounds, use it to declare and 8 per cent dividend one month, and close down for lack of cash the following month".

The building was acquired by the Bank of New Zealand in 1910 and was to be subject to at least one more remarkable event. In October 1943, a military aircraft flying over the city accidentally dropped a belly fuel tank which plummeted through a first floor cupola of the bank, exploding in the banking chamber and starting a fire which destroyed most of the chamber and caused damage to other floors.
