Statement of significance

The Isabella Watson is historically significant as an example of an emigrant ship from the UK to Port Phillip. Its archaeological significance lies in the remainder of the ship's cargo that is associated with the wreck and has the potential to reveal information about mid C19th material culture. It is historically and socially significant for its association with the ongoing debate surrounding the Port Phillip Pilot Service, and for its association with 9 deaths

VHR history

After a fair voyage the immigrant ship, in attempting to enter the Heads, struck the then uncharted Corsair Rock in a sudden violent squall and wind change at 5 pm. Starboard side stove in, stern and stern post carried away. Against his better judgement, Captain Fullarton finally acquiesced to the passengers' pleas for the boats to be launched. One landed safely but the ship's mizzen mast fell on the next boat, capsizing it as it left the ship - 6 women and 3 men drowned. The remainder (about 60) were landed safely after the pilots, on a rescue mission, managed to secure a line to the rocks. Pilot Tobin commended for battling the surf with a life-line. However, Pilot Lawler resigned - had been late leaving to board Isabella Watson, and, unable to reach the wrecked vessel due to the heavy seas, had returned to Queenscliff to consult with the other pilots. Captain Fullarton, last to leave Isabella Watson, was praised for risking his own life for those of the passengers. Early press reports indicated that eight, not nine, people had drowned. Press called on the government to ensure that the pilot service operate outside the Heads and for lights at the Heads. In 1842 the vessel had carried 197male convicts (incl. 2 who died) to Hobart. Ports and Harbors incorrectly gave date lost as 21 April 1852.
