VHR history

The JW Alexander was towing the empty barges, Sidney and Orange Grove, when it was badly damaged in a collision with the Allara, which was bound for Melbourne with a coal cargo. The tug was struck amidships, nearly cut in half, and thrown on to the sand-bank on beam ends. Two crew were hurled into the water, one clung to a rope dangling from the Allara for 15 minutes before being heard. All five crew had lucky escapes. The lighterman on the Sidney cut the tow rope with an axe after the collision. Captain McBain claimed the tug was travelling at half speed. It grounded on the north bank, adjacent to No. 3 beacon. It was reported to be one of the best tugs visiting Geelong. The Marine Court of Inquiry verdict was that Captain H. H. Watson of the Allara had failed to reduce speed in the Channel and to keep his vessel under control: the Allara had struck the south bank, then tug. Both lighters owned by the Victorian Lighterage - Sidney (ex Protector) had been the famous cruiser of the South Australian Colonial Navy that went to resist the Boxer Rebellion in 1900, was integrated into the Australian Navy in 1911 and ended its days as a breakwater at Heron Island. The Orange Grove was crushed and sunk at No. North Wharf, Melbourne, in 1942, and raised as scrap metal. (ID 9, 154, 191)
