VHR history

The Merope sailed from our port on Thursday afternoon for Adelaide and was seen from the shore in the evening rounding the south-east point of the bay. It appears that at about 10 o'clock that night she altered her tack, standing to the noth east side of the bay. The Captain states that he then gave instructions to the mate to steer that course for 2 hours and then call him. The Captain went to sleep in the cuddy after these directions, and when he went back up at half past 12 he found the vessel along the breakers. The part where she struck was about 3 miles eastward of the Fitzroy or Second Rivers half way between Portland and Belfast. There were 125 souls onboard the Merope, bound for Adelaide, no cargo. The passengers and crew got safely to shore. Several of the former came into town on Saturday. The vessel, although now bedded in sand, cannot be got off., being so much injured: she struck first on a ridge of rock close to the beach and was then forced over that to the sand
