VHR history

The ketch Swan was entered the Western Port-Melbourne trade under the command of Capt Loch sometime in the 1880s. According to Gliddon, the Swan was originally built as a cutter and rigged as a ketch. On its final voyage, the Swan was making for the Heads on 7 October 1906 at about 5 knots. About half way between Cape Schanck and Heads, the master saw the SS Queenscliff 3 miles from shore in bright moonlight, steaming at 10 knots. He kept green light of Queenscliff on the starboard side when suddenly the steamer bore down on the Swan, striking it on starboard side, driving a large hole through the 13" planking. The crew lowered the boat and got clear in time to avoid being caught in the rigging as the Swan heeled over. They were taken on board the Queenscliff with only the clothes they stood in. The ship's papers were lost. Two hours later, the ketch still visible with waves washing over it. The master and crew were landed at Rhyll at 8 am next morning. Janson owned the Swan for 18 years and it was still sound after 44 years of service. A Court of Marine Inquiry found Charles P. Johnson, mate of the Queenscliff and in charge at the time, guilty of careless navigation in neglecting to keep a proper look out. Taking into account his good record, the Court suspended his certificate for three months and fined him 5 guineas on account of the expense of the inquiry.
